

Matthew Key Moseley

Matthew Moseley graduated from the University of Houston's Hobby School of Public Affairs with a Master of Public Policy in 2022 where he was honored to receive the Garnet Coleman Award for Student Excellence. After graduating, Matthew has remained involved with the Hobby School by delivering the Spring 2023 alumni commencement address, becoming active in the alumni association, and serving as the alumni speaker for multiple graduate school information sessions.

Since 2020, Mr. Moseley has worked for the Harris County Intergovernmental and Global Affairs department. In his current role as senior specialist, he supports the County's efforts to identify legislative and funding priorities, and then advances those priorities before state officials in Austin and federal officials in Washington D.C.

Prior to 2020, Matthew worked in the energy industry upon receiving a Bachelor of Science in Petroleum Engineering from Louisiana State University in 2014. After starting his career working for corporate profits in the private sector, Matthew successfully transitioned into the public sector to work more directly for the public good.

Having lived in both rural and urban America, volunteered in small and large cities, and worked in both less and well-funded states, Matthew has seen the stark contrasts of how public policy at the local, state, and federal levels can produce widely various community outcomes. With both public and private sector professional experience, a demonstrated ability to lead, manage, and execute key initiatives, as well as a proven record of solving complex problems in diverse working environments, he continues to pursue his passion of developing strategies that improve people's lives.

Matthew moved to the Houston area in 2017, the same year he married his wife, Ivana. They welcomed their first child, Amelia, in 2022. His family are active members of Church of the King in Katy, Texas. Matthew enjoys reading, travelling, and golf.
